During the First World War, thousands of Canadian men went overseas to fight, leaving their lives and jobs behind. To fill these jobs, many women went to work—some for the first time. Canadian women supported the war effort in many ways including working in factories such as the Dominion Arsenal. One of the jobs they had was to fill ammunition cartridges for the battlefield.

Discussion Questions:

How did women's work during First World War contribute to the evolution of women's political and economic rights and their role in society?

During the war, women worked in jobs traditionally occupied by men. When the war ended in 1918, women were forced to give up their jobs to returning soldiers. What might this have felt like for the women?

War and conflicts continue to rage around the world. Women are no longer, necessarily, bystanders of war. Some choose to join military organizations. In some countries, women are required to do military service alongside men. How does war continue to impact women today—on and off the battlefield?

Activities:

Women took on many roles and responsibilities during the First World War on the home front. In addition to working in factories what else did women do to support the war effort? Consider farming and food production, health care, volunteering, and industrial work.

Research women's roles in the military and peacekeeping around the world today.

Visit the Fortifications of Quebec National Historic Site or visit a site in your community related to women in war—perhaps a farm or factory where women worked during wartime or a war memorial that honours women who served in war.
